

CLIMATE WITNESS

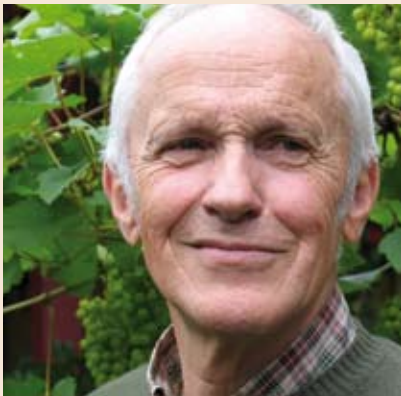

Georg Sperber Bavaria, Germany

Has worked as a forester for more than 30 years and kept a diary of his observations for more than 20 years. For 33 years, was in charge of a large, well-known deciduous forest called Steigerwald.

"The 1990s was the warmest decade in climate history, and this was obvious to anyone who lives in touch with nature. Rainfall used to peak in spring and early summer, when the plants needed the extra water most, but since the Nineties this peak has moved to autumn. In my forests the consequences for spruce trees are especially dramatic. They're under attack from bark beetle populations. And the bark beetle isn't the only harmful parasite that loves the warmer temperatures - the oak procession moth also spreads heavily. In the Fifties, the moth was an entomological rarity but, nowadays, local authorities are forced to hire fire brigades to battle the moth and seal off oak forests to protect the public from the moth, whose poisonous hairs can cause painful skin irritations that may last up to two years."
